Hitler believed that the essence of morality lay in the willingness of an individual to sacrifice his life for the community. He defined nationalism as the willingness to act with a boundless and all-embracing love for the people and, if necessary, to die for it. Hitler wrote in Mein Kampf that in the First World War thousands and thousands of young Germans had stepped forward with self-sacrificing resolve to sacrifice their young lives freely and joyfully at the altar of the fatherland. Killing mental patients involved the entire German psychiatric community.
